Thursday, May 2, 1985

HOMER NEWS

把用 香港、和雪湖市南部

Freight business will eclipse fishing, tourism, Tillion says

Fishing and tourism will continue as important elements in the local economy, but freight is the future, Clem Tillion said in a speech here Monday.

He advised caution when using the present to predict the future; vision is necessary as well.

Tourism and fishing are both viable industries, Mr. Tillion told the Chamber of Commerce. But in the search for tourists, don't sacrifice quality of life for Clem Tillion year around residents, he advised. And, he said, don't during his speech, including cripple successful fishermen the fact that he is not runnby catering to the needs of ing for governor. He said he those who can't make the is backing George Sullivan fishery pay. for the job, "because I know "Pay attention to what the what he can do." highliners say," Mr. Tillion The former president of said, "the ones who aren't the state legislature, trade

```
negotiator, and world
whining."
 Low interest loans and
                           fisheries emissary of the Hammond administration,
other subsidies make it harder for the successful said Gov. Bill Sheffield fishermen, while making it "never meant to be a bad easier for those who don't governor. He just doesn't have the know-how or the
                           know how to be a good one."
good fortune, he said. "The
                             Mr. Sheffield had limited public has to eat it in the government experience
end," Mr. Tillion said.
                           before his election in 1982
 In similar manner, he said and had never even sat on a inch of that and more," he tourism has an important city council, Mr. Tillion place in the local economy, observed. "He just bought but should not be allowed to himself the governorship as that Seward's port will never supplant the contributions
                           a sort of retirement present.
and rob the pleasures from Homer is not a prime loca-
full time residents. "Your tion for a freight depot, Mr.
full time residents are worth
                           Tillion said, but it could func-
a lot," he said.
                           tion as one. It needs a dock
 Mr. Tillion suggested capable of handling a "line
targeting tourist promotion
                           ship" such as those owned by
at visitors who fly here,
                           Sealand or American Presi-
rather than drive here.
                           dent Lines.
That's where the money is,
                           Barge traffic, for all its re-
he said.
                           cent increase, is not the key
 "Those are the people who to a clean and healthy
come to Homer for an freight industry, he said,
aesthetic tour, then hit the urging people not to settle Homer Spit, with 500 for a barge dock. "Foss and campers and overflowing Northland love you, but the people are being skewered."
dumpsters."
 Mr. Tillion touched on a
                            He used bottom fish as a number of familiar themes familiar example. If the processed product must be trucked to Anchorage to be loaded on ship or plane for market, the cost would waters fishing allocation makes it unattractive to among several firms, he unload fish in Homer at all. said. Each knows what their But, if Homer had a dock share will be, and can harvest by whatever suited to ocean freighters, those ships could stop here schedule best suits the on their way to or from Anmarket. chorage. By deducting the With open entry halibut trucking costs, it would be fishing, he said, the market feasible to off load and prois swamped by the few opencess bottomfish here, he said
```

That day, Mr. Tillion said, will spell the end of the barge business. "Tugs and tows can't compete with a line ship," he said. By his analysis, line ship service to Homer could replace all the freight now shipped to Anchorage and trucked to the Central and Southern Kenai Peninsula. That trucking adds 45-48 percent to the cost of shipping goods from the Lower 48, he said With that in mind, Mr. Tillion advised the city to reserve its new 30-acre port staging area for freight. "You'll need every square said. By contrast, he predicted be more than a terminal for coal or grain. And for that matter, he said it would make more economic sense to process Alaska grain in state, rather than for export. The product: alcohol, in beverage form or for medicinal purposes. The area fishing industry is a long ways from dead, but is being threatened by laissez faire capitalism, said Mr. Tillion. Open entry in the fisheries spurs over harvesting, he said, predicting that fate for black cod stocks. The Japanese system works better, he said, and

might serve as a kind of model for a share quota limit ings, fresh fish is scarce price paid to fishermen and in the halibut fishery. The most of the year, and the raises the price paid by con-Japanese spread their U.S. cost of storing fish drops the sumers.

N BARS

PAGE 7

Anchorage Daily News/Erik Hill

Terje Sorensen, relief captain, poses Thursday on the aft deck of the 619-foot luxury liner Sagafjord.

Welcome to port, captain

Luxury liner pulls into Anchorage on first of seven trips

By HAL BERNTON Daily News business reporter

One of the world's most luxurious cruise ships — the 619-foot long Sagafjord — pulled into the Port of Anchorage on Thursday for a brief, end-of-the-line stop on a 10-day cruise up the Inside Passage from Vancouver, B.C.

The ship was welcomed on its inaugural visit to Anchorage by the local visitors bureau's chorus line of dancing critters and Mayor Tony Knowles, who hosted a brief on-board reception.

As 500 passengers, most of whom are returning home via jet, departed from the ship, crew members treated Anchorage visitors to a series of tours through a spacious ballroom, elegant dining room and on-deck health spa.

But the ship's captain was absent from the festivities. Magnar Berntzen was flown from Valdez to an Anchorage hospital Sunday after suffering severe nose bleeds, crew members said.

Standing in for Berntzen was the ship's second in command, Terje Sorensen, who dressed in an immaculate white uniform and white shoes blemished by only the faintest of scuffs.

Sorensen, a Norwegian who began his maritime career 23

aboard the Sagajford during the next five months.

In years past, several cruise basis, said Tom Brennan, a spokesman for the Anchorage Convention and Visitor Center.

shops and restaurants, especially those downtown.

Sorensen said the Sagafjord is ing.

During the fall, winter and Among those leaving were early spring, the boat normally Paul and Maribel Stambaugh, embarks on round-the-world, who first boarded the vessel 33 South American and West Indies days ago in Fort Lauderdale, Fla. cruises, he said.

For the past five seasons, the summer cruises between Vancouver and Valdez.

age

But it wasn't Anchorage's lure suite booked.

years ago as a deckhand in the as a major Alaska tourist attracmerchant marine, said six more tion that prompted the ship to round-trip cruises are planned cruise farther north this season, from Vancouver to Anchorage Sorensen said. Rather, it was a change in Cunard's marketing strageties.

This year the Sagafjord is lines occasionally have stopped in breaking its North Pacific tour Anchorage but never on a regular into two segments, one north to Alaska and another south to Van-· couver.

To break the tour into two The ship's passengers are ex- parts, the north-bound tour needpected to lend a boost to gift ed to end at a port like Anchorage, with an airport that handles flights from international airlines, Sorensen said.

The Cunard was scheduled to one of two ships honored by depart Anchorage on Thursday Fieldings Worldwide Guide to evening with about 450 new pas-Cruises with a five-star-plus rat- sengers and 50 holdovers, Sorensen said.

Maribel said the skies were rather bleak during the first five days out of Vancouver and then Sagafjord has offered round-trip cleared to reveal "breathtaking scenery.'

The cost of the 10-day Vancou-This year Cunard Lines, the ver-to-Anchorage cruise was not New York-based company that listed in the company's brochure. owns the Sagafjord, decided to However, the cost of a similar 14extend the trip north to Anchor- day cruise ranged between $4,020 and $11,490, depending on the